CRANIAL DIAGNOSIS.

In like manner, but more marvellously, it has been abundantly shown in the long experience of the author that different localities about the head also correspond with internal viscera, etc.; and that even the precise nature of the trouble can, by the different sensations elicited by the electric touch, be defined with an accuracy quite transcending the ordinary diagnostic methods, and at a stage in which disease utterly eludes those methods, in many cases.

All attempts heretofore to make known this really important discovery have subjected the author to abuse, as might be expected. But, waiving all such considerations, the discoverer hopes to put it within the power of every scientist or physician to avail himself of its aid, as soon as the proper charts can be perfected; assured that whilst pride may scoff, as always, yet wisdom shall still be justified of her children. This system of CRANIAL DIAGNOSIS, by which the character of disease and the locality of the parts affected can be determined with great certainty, is taught only by its discoverer, the author, and by her daughters. So positively has its efficacy been confirmed by many years of experience, that the author desires to impress upon those administering electricity as a curative agent, the importance of relying upon the unerring indications resulting from her method, in preference to accepting as accurate any presumption or indication of disease not corroborated by the CRANIAL DIAGNOSIS.
